What are Technical Indicators ?

Technical indicators, employed by traders who use technical analysis, are intuitive or pattern-based indications produced by a security's or contract's price, volume, and open interest. By analysing previous data, technical analysts utilise indicators to predict future price changes. While some technical indicators function independently, others collaborate. They are employed in technical analysis to determine a security's strength or weakness by concentrating on trading signals, patterns, price changes, and other analytical charting tools. While certain technical market indicators are meant to be utilised for a particular financial market, others are intended to be used for all markets.
